the service and by taking some thought for their comfort. Even then it is not an easy matter, especially as there will be some periods of the year when an apple orchard will not keep them entirely occupied.

This is true even where much so-called expert labor is brought in from outside for the busy period, and we might add that outside labor of this character is often a delusion and a

Requirements for Successful share, besides costing much more than the home labor. This, then, obviously means that some other crops must be provided, either on the same orchard farm or near by, where regular labor can be profitably employed during the

In this line of work, as in all others, the great question is the profit to be derived from it. These and other economic questions must be taken into consideration, and one must have his operations large enough to give regular employment to himself and his men on one special line long enough, and in such a way as to make the labor efficient. That is, it must not be the many varieties or too
